Citrulline

Dr. David J. Riggs and Dr. Michael A. Zemel carried out a study on the impact of citrulline supplementation on the reproductive function of men. New research has shown that citrulline, a crucial amino acid, has healing qualities for managing health. In the study, 20 men with low energy levels were given 60 mg/kg of body weight of citrulline twice a day for four weeks, with remarkable outcomes.

This study reveals that the ingredient enhances performance in males, which is significant as a significant number of men suffering from exhaustion tend to postpone seeking medical help until their condition becomes severe.

CoQ10

CoQ10 is an endogenous substance present in cells. It bears a strong resemblance to vitamins. It aids in the process of ATP synthesis, which is essential for the body's energy production. The adequate maintenance of heart muscles, healthy blood vessels, brain tissue, and other bodily functions is imperative. The decline of CoQ10 levels is observed with advancing age, which could potentially pave the way for the development of cardiovascular ailments.

Lysine

Dr. Robert H. Greenblatt researched the effects of supplementing lysine in men with low testosterone levels, as demonstrated in a different study. The amino acid lysine is crucial for protein synthesis. Evidence suggests a correlation between diminished testosterone levels and decreased lysine levels. He observed that it effectively increased testosterone levels in the patients.

The researchers divided a group of forty men between the ages of 18 and 65 into two categories. One category received 500 mg of lysine three times a day, while the other received a placebo. Both groups were similar initially. After 12 weeks, the lysine group showed significant increases in testosterone levels. The results suggest that lysine could be a useful treatment for people with hypogonadism.

Following their research, the authors have determined that the administration of lysine supplements is not only safe and well-tolerated but also has the potential to effectively normalize serum testosterone levels in individuals afflicted with idiopathic hypogonadotropic hypogonadism."
